COURSE PROPOSAL

FOLK ----: INTRODUCTION TO FOLKLORE,
Prof S. Roldan, Ph.D.
Class hours: -----.

ABSTRACT OF COURSE:

This course is a brief survey of folklore theory and methods. It is not chronological in perspective, but theoretical and practical emphasizing the key concepts and highlights of the discipline. It examines schools and movement, and explores various current trends and viewpoints. A strong emphasis in fieldwork will be made with actual mini-projects as class assignments. Bibliographical scholarship will also be addressed.

Key concepts such as: folk, text, context, tradition, and folk genres will be discussed vigorously. A strong emphasis will be on the current theories and trends of folklore scholarship, especially as they apply to situational context, and folklore performance theory. The student will be introduced to the four major areas in folklore research: 1) material culture, 2) custom, beliefs, and folk ideas, 3) oral/verbal expressive folklore, and 4) folk performance and ceremony. A focus will be given to oral/verbal folklore and its relationship to literature and literary studies.

Since folklore as a discipline is highly interdisciplinary because it uses theory and methodology from literary analysis, linguistics, anthropology/ethnography and history, the course will provide an ample opportunity for students from various fields to share their ideas and particular research strategies. Interdisciplinary approaches will be fostered. Particular attention will be given to aspects of literature and folklore studies with an emphasis on Anglo-Caribbean language and literature.

OBJECTIVES:

By the end of the semester, students are expected to have obtained basic knowledge in the following areas:

- Overview of historical-theoretical development of the discipline
- Knowledge of conceptual framework of folklore's four major areas
- Basic skills in folklore fieldwork, techniques and methodologies
- Knowledge of current trends and views, including recent performance theories

- Application of folklore theory and methodology in the area of Caribbean literature
- Knowledge of oral/verbal folklore and its various facets, including the various kinds of folk narratives, tales, fairy tales, and personal experience narratives.

EVALUATION:

The work of students will be evaluated by both written and oral presentations, including class assignments in actual fieldwork. The final exam will be a special fieldwork project due on _____.
